Antiepileptic drugs, including some that are given to children with epilepsy, can cause serious kidney problems. An important part of this process is the loss of minerals such as calcium from the kidney, which can cause kidney stones and even renal failure. It is not clear how many children develop these kidney problems. The most effective way to prevent these problems is to have careful monitoring of kidney function and stop using the drug if this function starts to decline. The two new studies looked at the effect of four anti-epileptic drugs on kidney function in young children: carbamazepine (marketed as Tegretol in the UK) valproate (marketed as Depak
